Buyer-Side Conversation Scripts

Cold outreach, follow-up, objection handling, and negotiation

How to use these scripts

These are starting points, not final scripts. They reflect what operators publicly describe as effective patterns for new-vendor outreach to small and mid-size buyers. Modify them to your voice, your vertical, and your specific situation.

Three principles: be specific (vertical, geography, volume); be credible (consent infrastructure, compliance posture); be low-commitment in the ask (15-minute call, sample leads, evaluation period). Generic vendor pitches don't open conversations.

Script 1 — Cold email opener

Subject lines that work

Email body

> Hi [First Name],
> I run a small lead-generation operation focused on [specific sub-vertical, e.g., "family law in metro Atlanta"]. Producing [_____ leads / week] right now, exclusive form leads with TrustedForm consent capture and standard intake qualification.
> I'm building out my buyer roster and looking for two or three starter customers in your area willing to evaluate a small batch. Happy to send the first [3-5] leads at no cost so you can compare intake conversion against your existing supply.
> If they work for you, we can talk pricing and terms. If they don't, no obligation. Worth a 15-minute call this week or next to discuss?
> [Your name]
> [Phone, email, simple operator title]

Script 2 — Follow-up sequence

If the first email gets no response (the typical outcome), a short follow-up sequence:

Follow-up 1 (3-5 days after initial)

> Hi [First Name],
> Following up on the note I sent last week about [sub-vertical] leads in [metro]. Probably caught you at a busy time. Two questions if it's easier than a call:
> 1. Are you actively considering new lead vendors right now, or is your supply solid?
> 2. If you were considering, what would matter most to you — price, exclusivity, source mix, something else?
> Either answer is useful. Thanks.
> [Your name]

Follow-up 2 (5-7 days after follow-up 1)

> Last note from me on this — I don't want to over-email. Couple of operators in your area have started using our leads recently in [sub-vertical]; happy to share a sample of the first ten leads we'd send your way (anonymized) if you'd like to evaluate quality before any conversation.
> If now isn't the right time, I'll check back in a few months. Thanks.
> [Your name]

Three follow-ups is usually the right cadence. Beyond that, you're closer to harassment than to sales. Move on; you can revisit in 4-6 months.

Script 3 — The first discovery call

Opening (90 seconds)

> Thanks for taking the time, [Name]. Quick context on my end and then I want to learn about your operation.
> I'm [your name]; I run [operation name], a [size description] lead-gen operation in [sub-vertical] focused on [geography]. We capture leads through [traffic source description] with [consent vendor] consent records. Currently producing [_____ leads / month]; supplying [_____ buyers] including [reference if you have one, otherwise skip].
> What I'd like to understand from you today: what your current lead supply looks like, what's working, what isn't, and whether there's a fit. Mind if I ask a few questions?

Discovery questions

Listen more than you talk on a first call. The buyer's answers tell you everything you need to know about whether you can serve them, and the act of being listened to is itself a meaningful differentiator from generic vendor pitches.

Script 4 — Objection handling

"We're not looking for new vendors right now."

> Understood. Quick question — if a current supplier had a quality issue or a sudden volume drop, would you want to have a vetted backup in place, or would you start evaluating from scratch at that moment?
> I'm not asking for a contract today. Just asking whether it would be useful to have us as a vetted option you could turn on if you needed to. I can send a small sample so you have something to evaluate when timing is right.

"Your price is too high."

> Help me understand. Compared to what — your shared inventory, or your exclusive inventory? Because we're priced at [exclusive / shared] tier and the comparison should be apples to apples.
> If we are above your benchmark for the same lead type, what's the gap? Sometimes the gap is intake-conversion math — at our typical conversion rate, the CAC works out to [X]; what does your CAC look like at the vendors you're using today?

"We've been burned by new vendors before."

> Fair concern. Most lead-gen operators that fail buyers are failing on one of three things — consent records, qualification rigor, or speed of delivery. Here's how we handle each:
> Consent: [TrustedForm / Jornaya] certificate on every lead, retained 5+ years, produced on audit request.
> Qualification: [your qualification protocol; mention if it's call-verified vs. form-only].
> Speed: [your typical delivery latency from form submission to buyer CRM].
> If any of those would be a deal-breaker if not met, I'd rather know now than have you find out three weeks in.

"What's your volume — can you scale with us?"

> Honest answer: I'm currently producing [_____ leads / week] and have head-room to roughly double in the near term. If your needs are above that, I'm probably not your only-vendor — but I can be a steady share of your supply. Want to start with a sample batch and see how the quality > compares?

Script 5 — The negotiation conversation

Once a buyer has accepted a sample batch and the leads convert acceptably, the conversation moves to terms.

Pricing

> Based on the sample, our current pricing for [shared / exclusive] leads in this sub-vertical is [$X]. Volume tiers start at [$Y per lead] above [N leads/month].
> Open to discussing a starter rate for the first [30 / 60 / 90] days while we build the track record together — would [$Z] for the first [period] work, with a step-up to [$X] after?

Payment terms

> For new relationships, our standard is [50% prepayment / weekly invoicing / net 15] until we've established a track record together. We can move to standard terms after [30-90] days.
> If that's a deal-breaker, can we do prepayment for the first [N] leads as a demonstration of good faith, then move to weekly invoicing after?

Exclusivity

> Our exclusive pricing for [sub-vertical] is [$X]. At your volume of [N leads/month], we can guarantee exclusivity in [geography] if we commit at that volume. Want to scope what exclusivity would mean for your intake math?

The walking-away conversation

> Some buyers will not be workable. If you're hitting hard pushback on TCPA reps, audit rights, indemnification, or quality definitions, walk. These are the protections that make the business sustainable; agreeing to weaken them to win a deal is a way to lose the business.
> Phrasing: "I appreciate the time, but the terms you're describing aren't workable for me — I need [specific clause] to stay as-is or I can't do this profitably. If something changes on your end, please reach out. Otherwise good luck with your supply search."

> Standing disclosures

> These scripts are research-based starting points, not finished sales playbooks. Use them as raw material; adapt to your voice, your vertical, and your specific situation. The course author is a curriculum builder, not a multi-million-dollar lead-gen operator; specific tactical claims in trade publications and operator podcasts are the underlying sources for the patterns above.
